Introduction

The present volume represents one of the outcomes of the ongoing project “Database for Museums in the Middle East” conducted by the Center for Modern Middle East Studies, National Museum of Ethnology, and supported by the National Institutes for the Humanities (NIHU) Transdisciplinary Project “Area Studies of the Modern Middle East.” As is evident from its simple title, the project is ambitious, aiming to build a comprehensive museum database of the Middle East and North Africa region. I had the privilege of contributing to this extraordinary goal and was assigned the task of compiling data on three countries of largely former French colonies in the Maghreb region: Morocco, Tunisia, and Algeria. The data I gathered are available online both in English and Japanese along with the data of other Middle Eastern and North African countries¹. This volume contains the slightly simplified English version of my effort.

The survey for this study was conducted exclusively online from December 2018 to September 2019. All information represented in the present volume is current. However, some museums may have since closed or undergone renovations; recently opened museums such as the National Museum of Photography in Rabat, Morocco, have not been included. In conducting the online survey, the extent to which existing lists of museums in the three Maghreb countries could be relied on varied considerably. The Tunisian Ministry of Cultural Affairs has published a nationwide list of archaeological sites and museums, both public and private, on its website² and the Wikipedia entry for “List of Tunisian Museum” in Arabic is satisfyingly, if not perfectly extensive³. Although the Algerian Ministry of Culture manages a website called Portal of Algerian Cultural Heritage, which is impressively inclusive, the section on museums reveals much scope for improvement⁴. Neither the Moroccan Ministry of Culture, Youth, and Sports nor the National Foundation of Museums⁵ seem to have much interest in developing a thorough inventory of museums across the country and, to the best of my knowledge, a comprehensive museum list is virtually nonexistent.

⁵ De Micheli cites the statistics published by the National Foundation of Museums (NFM) in 2015 that counts 14 state sponsored museums and 66 private museums in the country. I found that the URL to which she refers has become invalid and, in any case, the notion of a “museum” to the NFM seems very narrowly defined. See, De Micheli, Francesca (2020) “Minority Audience: The Oudayas Museum and the Manufacturing of Elitism in Moroccan Museums,” in Rey, Virginie ed., The Art of Minorities: Cultural Representation in Museums of the Middle East and North Africa, Edinburgh University Press, pp.72-86.

Regardless of the differences in availability of useful resources by country and area, the basic approach I followed was consistent. First, I used Google Maps to search for museums in a certain area. Since some museums may not be registered on the web service, I scrutinized the search results for “[name of same area] + museum(s)” on the search engine, both in Arabic and French—and occasionally in Spanish or English—to avoid oversight. I repeated this procedure with every relevant administrative division (and its substrata when necessary) of each country, one after another. I am fully aware of the risks in my methodology, including the fact that anyone can register any place as a museum on Google Maps. As search results of “museums” typically tend to include mosques, monuments, ruined buildings, and souvenir shops, I verified the information found on Google Maps with various other sources such as official websites, Facebook pages, local news, blog entries, and visitors’ reviews. Ambiguous places or institutions for which it was hard to draw a clear distinction between a museum and other facilities—such as an art gallery or cultural center—were judged from the standpoint of whether they fulfilled (or showed any willingness to fulfill) basic preservative, exhibitive, and educational functions of museums. Still, I may have overlooked some museums, and I certainly was not always successful in specifying exact locations. Any shortcoming in this area is my responsibility alone. That being said, the sum total of accumulated data is of 428 museums. However, before we move on to any specific background or analysis of data in hand, there remains an issue that must be addressed.

The targeted area of this study—the western block of North Africa—contains disputed territories. Given the fact that the whole database project tackles the Middle East and North Africa region as a geographical entity despite regional, ethnic, religious, cultural, and political differences within it, I decided to include the museums in these lands. Hence, museums not only in coastal areas of Western Sahara under Moroccan control but also in the two Spanish enclave cities of Ceuta and Melilla are compiled under the rubric of Morocco, Western Sahara, and Spanish Enclaves. Likewise, the People’s Liberation Army Museum, or the national museum-cum-headquarter of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic, located in Tindouf, Algeria, is incorporated in the Algerian section of this volume. I expect that readers will understand that these decisions do not reflect endorsements of any political position on my part or on the part of the Center for Modern Middle East Studies, National Museum of Ethnology.

Just as present-day border issues invariably originate in European colonialism, the history of museums in the Maghreb region is not exempt from colonial legacy. In fact, as the literature on museums in the Maghreb countries reveals⁶, the inception of museums in the region was not merely an importation of the European idea but an integral part of la mission civilisatrice, or the French variant of the White Man's Burden. The National Museum of Antiquities and Islamic Arts in Alger, Algeria—the very first museum in the region— was established in 1835 (and moved to the present location in 1897). Collections of the first generation of Algerian and Tunisian colonial museums in the 19th century comprised a broad range of local objects of curiosities that had been donated to, bought by, or looted by French colonizers and researchers. Eventually, these accumulated “booties” started to be classified in an increasingly rigid and scientific way, which led to creation of two kinds of specialized museums, in the region at large, with thematically or chronologically organized exhibitions in the early 20th century, namely, archaeology museums and ethnography museums. While the former glorified remnants of ancient civilizations allegedly of European ancestry, the latter conserved indigenous culture, which was deemed to disappear before long and thus in need of protection by the ruling French. Ethnography museums are particularly noteworthy because, at that time, they were the only museums that included in their target the local population or, to be more exact, a specific group of people among the colonized: artisans of traditional craftworks. They were not treated as normal visitors, of course, but as trainees who were to be reeducated in the institutions for “scientifically” standardized, authentic Islamic arts⁷. After independence, colonial museums were nationalized by the new states and similar museums were even reproduced in cities invested for tourism. Furthermore, postcolonial states began founding new types of museums to commemorate their battles and victories against the colonial power. Examples of these museums of the independence are the National Museum of the Resistance and the Liberation Army in Morocco, the Leader Square Museum in Tunisia, and the Mujahid Museum in Algeria.

In her comparative study on museums in the Maghreb countries, Bernadette Nadia Saou-Dufrène highlights three shared characteristics⁸. The first is overrepresentation of archaeology and ethnography museums, the reason for which can be easily found in the history stated above. The second characteristic is the quasi-absence of science museums with very few exceptions. The third is the underrepresentation of modern art museums, which has begun to improve only recently. Although Saou-Dufrêne's argument is not based on any statistics or numbers because she fairly claims that the inaccessibility of information makes doing so difficult, we now have the figures, however imperfect they might be, to verify her words.

Figure 1 shows the number of museums in the three countries⁹ and their categorical disambiguation. Museums are basically classified based on their main collections in accordance with the categories introduced by Ambrose and Paine¹⁰. What stands out at first glance is the overwhelming abundance of history museums in Morocco and Algeria. The vast majority of these are local branches of the aforementioned national museums of the independence. Both governments, but especially the Moroccan government in recent years¹¹, are eager to build such museums across their respective countries. In Tunisia, however, history museums fall in the third largest category, of which only five museums are dedicated to the independence or to Habib Bourguiba, the leader of the National Movement.

¹⁰ Ambrose, Timothy and Crispin Paine (1993) Museum Basics, Routledge. However, note that in Figure 1, natural history and geology museums are incorporated into science museums due to their scarcity.

If one combines ethnography and archaeology museums, they form a sizable group of importance in every country, as Saou-Dufrène argues. However, the balance between the two differs considerably among countries. Morocco runs short of archaeology museums in comparison with Tunisia and Algeria, seemingly reflecting the number of archaeological sites in each country. In terms of science and art museums, the former remain underrepresented in all countries while there is a proliferation of the latter in Morocco, especially in its biggest tourist destination city of Marrakech. It can be argued that the fact that this important move is accelerated more by private/corporate ventures than by the state indicates broader structural changes in the country's economy and society brought about by global neoliberalism.

In conclusion, I believe that museums, notwithstanding their ostensibly objective and “timeless” look, can reflect various trends of the times, either by way of exhibitions or in statistical numbers. In this sense, and because they are institutions open to the general public, they inevitably entail certain political aspects and, at times, can be politically or even violently targeted. Let us never forget the attack on the National Bardo Museum in Tunis, Tunisia, which took the lives of 24 people in March 2015. At the time of this writing, what becomes of museums in the Maghreb region and in the world at large after the current pandemic crisis remains to be seen.

Finally, I'd like to express my gratitude to Dr. Kenji Kuroda and Prof. Tetsuo Nishio at the Center for Modern Middle East Studies, National Museum of Ethnology, who gave me this opportunity and supported me both financially and emotionally to continue my research every month.

¹¹ Technically, local branches of the Moroccan National Museum of Resistance and the Liberation Army do not qualify as museums and are merely referred to as an espace (space). Unlike other public museums in Morocco, they are under the tutelage of High Commission for the Ex-Resistants and Veterans of the Liberation Army, including the central museum in the capital.
